MUSC-Musicology

MUSC 1003 Music and American Democracy 3 Credit Hours
Music often functions to unite a people or a society. Given that the American people and society change with each passing generation and given that their guaranteed liberties seldom unite them in a wholly cohesive chorus, the ways music has been used to reinforce ideals, advance causes, shape social norms and satisfy diverse constituencies offers a rich story. For the most part, American government has played a slight role in the unfolding of American music, although there have been fascinating exceptions to this rule. A situation of minimal government policy allows for the marketplace of ideas to determine what is composed, performed, taught and cherished. Within this marketplace, fissures have frequently emerged dividing advocates of one or another approach allowing for vigorous debates. This course affords students an opportunity first to study these disputes as matters of historical record and then engage with these debates as they manifest themselves today. (F) [IV-WC].

Is nationalism, in the words of George Orwell, merely "power hunger tempered by self-deception," or does it contribute to the development of a democratic and tolerant citizenry? Why is nationalism associated with authoritarianism and ethnic conflict in the modern age, when the "golden age" of nationalism is linked to the emergence of democracy and self-determination? Did nationalism and the modern state arise simultaneously, or did one produce the other? How do elites seek to mobilize primordial bonds of kinship and loyalty, and what accounts for their success or failure to do so? When do nationalists seek autonomy or secession, and how might they be induced to share power after achieving independence? What motivates violence among ethnic actors and how might it be contained? This course addresses these questions and others in examining major theoretical approaches and thematic issues relevant to understanding nationalism and ethnic politics as modern phenomena.
